Art with 'Subtlety'

Arts. Check out the last installation that will take place at the Domino Sugar Factory.

The statue towers over viewers at 35-by-75 feet. See it live before July 6. / PROVIDED

Kara Walker is best known for her black stencils of antebellum scenes that critique Civil War-era ethics. But she just created her first large-scale project in Williamsburg's 90,000-square-foot Domino Sugar Factory.

Ripe with gallows humor, "A Subtlety: or the Marvelous Sugar Baby" tackles the powerful topic of race politics. The installation is an homage to the unpaid and overworked laborers who refined sugar in the factory from its conception in 1856 to its closure in 2004.

At times taboo and sexually charged, this provocative installation investigates the history of the Domino Sugar Factory through age-old racial tropes. The installation is a 35-foot-tall, 75-foot-long sphinx surrounded by child attendants — and it's all created from sugar and molasses.

A combination of racist stereotypes of black women, the head is a kerchief-wearing "Mammy," whose jolly persona lived to please the domestic needs of wealthy white families. Her body is the erogenous

"Jezebel" with her prominent breasts, buttocks and sexuality on display. With sullen faces, the molasses-covered attendants recall the historical socioeconomic gap between white and black culture. To give scale to the gargantuan installation, the children are the height of an average adult.

This exhibit is the last before the factory's demolition. In March 2014, the City Planning Commission approved a $1.5 billion redevelopment to connect the neighborhood to the waterfront and create a modern Brooklyn skyline.
